The Old Lesbian Oral Herstory Project

Issue One

Wow. A Decade and Counting!

A Brief History of the Old Lesbian Oral Herstory Project By Arden Eversmeyer

The Oral Herstory Project started ten years ago with the effort to get some stories of Houston women who were in failing health. It started with a personal friend of mine, Marie Mariano. My first interview was nerve-racking and quite a learning experience and I was glad it was with a friend.

Once I got the hang of it, I began collecting stories outside the Houston area as I traveled for my work with OLOC, Old Lesbians Organizing for Change. They helped get out the word about the Project and that located some of the women. Most of the women interviewed have come to know about the Project by word-of-mouth referrals from their friends — women who had shared their stories.

About seven years ago, OLOC asked to be involved in the Project. Since that time they have provided about 50% of the direct cost (materials, transcription, travel, etc.) of the Project. They have done this through grants and contributions.

When the Project began, there were no thoughts of a website or a book. We had no concept of how the Project would grow and that it would take on a life of its own. Almost without exception, the first thing asked by everyone when they learn about the Project is, “Is there a way we can read the stories?” Since I had no idea that the Project would grow into what it is today, I really didn’t know how to answer that. Up until recently, other than offering a few summarized stories in the OLOC newsletter, and four stories excerpted (by Pokey Anderson) for a magazine article, there wasn’t a good way to share them.

The goal had always been to gather and preserve the stories for future generations and for research. Today it seems just as important to develop a way to share them now, not just in the future.

The book idea was bandied about for several years before it really got started about three years ago. Margaret Purcell made the mistake of saying she thought it might be fun to try her hand at writing a book from the stories and there was no going back. She and her partner had spent many hours in Houston digitizing the collection, and she knew the stories. So the work began.

Once the book was well under-way, we realized a website was the natural next step. Mary Henry, Margaret's partner, took on that task. Now we have www.olohp.org and lots of plans on how to expand and make better use of it.

We now have our first book and plans for more. Information on how to order A Gift of Age: Old Lesbian Life Stories is available from our website.

Last year we incorporated the Project in order to apply for grants to subsidize the costs associated with the book. We didn't expect OLOC to assume any of those expenses too. They continue to contribute to the ongoing work of collecting and documenting stories for the Project, but we hope to pay for book and website by other means.

At this time there are 165 stories in the collection. About 30 still in the production process (being transcribed, edited and such). Of the 165 stories, some of the women have died since the start of the project.

When I started the Project, I was looking for women born before 1930. They're getting harder and harder to find. We have had to move the date forward, but the focus still remains on women 70 or older.

I have to admit I had to laugh at myself when I was surprised to realize that someone born in 1939 could actually be 70!

This is a traveling display used in the Herstory Project. Examples of two of the completed herstories lay on the table in front of display boards.

Why a Newsletter?
We really just want to share and make you more a part of the Project! Our plan is to publish 6 times a year and distribute it primarily via email. Each issue will contain an update about the Project, an article about a specific aspect of the OLOHP, photos and excerpts from a story or two.

C: This man, I guess he was 18 or 19, came into the movie theater where I was working and he was standing at the door. I was looking at him and he was looking at me. We started dating and everything, in fact, we became engaged. But I also, during that same time, started going to [women's] softball games.... They were having the women's fast pitch softball tournament at the park and I wanted to go. So about a week or so before I was supposed to be married, I broke my engagement. I told him I just felt like I was making a mistake. He cried and I cried... and I went to the softball game. So I guess that was when I probably came out to myself.

I: You had no idea?

C: I always had a couple of girlfriends in school. I'd have the best looking girlfriend there would be, even better looking than the football players had. But even at 13, 14, 15, I'd have a special friend at school and we'd walk back and forth to school together. Then they'd come to school the next day and say, "I can't play with you anymore." But there wouldn't be any reason.

Nobody ever said that I was a homosexual or lesbian or anything to my face. It was just real hurtful. Nobody talked about anything at home; they knew what was going on and everybody kept everything a damn secret.

Sharing some excerpts from a few of the Stories

D: One of the things that irritated the daylights out of me [about teaching in college] is that, at this time, my husband was an assistant dean of men. He'd been recruited for that position. When I went to talk to the dean, it was before they had salary scales. The dean offered me... I forget what the amount was, but it was a lot less than I wanted. I tried to get more and he said, "No. Your husband's working."

I thought, "That's not fair." Especially when I found out later that another colleague, a black woman who was at the head of her household, who did not have a master's degree completed, was getting paid more than I just because of her family position.

Fortunately, that dean left. The woman who replaced him sat down and she noticed the women's salaries and she noticed the men's salaries. I got a big chunk, a raise that year.

I was married 21½ years. It got to the point where, when we had moved to California and I knew he was fooling around, I became more and more feminist and more into who I was as a woman. The dance changed. I divorced.

During the fifteen years that I was by myself after my divorce, I did tons of reading. A lot of it had to do with spirituality. And it's interesting... the more that I read, the more women-centered I became.

D: There was a point where I said to myself, “I do not want to be alone anymore. And I know I do not want to be with a man.... The only way for me to find a woman I might want to be with is for me to come out.”

I called one of the “out” women I knew and had been friends with and asked her if she could come over. “I want to talk to you about something.” By the way, I was 60 and already retired! After some chit-chat, I said, “I guess you wonder what I wanted to talk to you about.” I could see her sitting there and grinning. She said, “I have an idea, but you have to say it.”

And so I said it. And she said, “You know, I knew that’s what you wanted to tell me. I’ve wondered for years when you were ever gonna come out!”

I: You alluded to the fact that you’ve known you were gay all your life.

F: Since I was born. I can remember going to the movies with little girls and putting my arm around ‘em, you know... trying to neck with them. In the movies! Never even thinking it was unusual! And I was always the doctor and they were always my assistants. I always knew I was gay. It never crossed my mind to be anything else.

I: Did you have any words for it, or you just knew?

F: I just knew that’s what I was. There were no words. I knew that I wanted to make out with that little girl. When I was a little kid in grade school, I hated little girls and did not want to play with them. I’d go and play with the little boys.... I never wanted to play hopscotch and dolls. Never had a doll! Broke my mother’s heart. What did I want for Christmas? Chaps. Guns. Soldiers. You know, all that neat stuff. And I got it every year. But somebody always threw a doll in. One of my grandmothers, my father’s grandmother, was a fantastic seamstress. She’d sew all these frou-frou little dresses and little lace things. I wouldn’t wear ‘em. I don’t know why in the world she sewed ‘em.
